
Outsourcing Your Warehousing Saves You Time, Money, and Headaches

When your business revolves around manufacturing, maintaining appropriate inventory is always top of mind for you. But the roller coaster of supply-and-demand puts a headache on top of that. And when you're a small to midsize business, where wearing multiple hats comes with the job, that headache is actually a migraine.

You're in the business of production – not storage.

Taking on all of the responsibilities of warehousing, transportation, and other logistics is a distraction from the quality control and customer service you do best. When you're spending more time managing your inventory than focusing on your core competencies, ask yourself what type of opportunity cost you're truly sacrificing.

Finding the right third-party logistics (3PL) partner will optimize your customer service resources so you can maximize your revenue and grow your customer base.

Outsourcing Your Warehousing Saves You Time, Money, and Headaches

Focus On Your Expertise

Your expertise is doing what you do, which doesn't include managing a warehouse, staffing it, or dealing with its myriad of logistics. Focus on your core talents.

Leave It To Their Expertise

An outsourced warehousing and logistics operation has the expertise and know-how to solve any problems that arise, or even prevent them from happening in the first place. The end result – you and your customers are happier.

Simplify

Outsourcing your warehousing eliminates your responsibility of coordinating operations between various shippers, carriers, transloaders, and other providers. Knowing your product is successfully going from point A to point B and your customers are happy is all you need to worry about. Simple.

Lower Your Risk

Outsourcing your warehousing operations reduces your risk. The warehousing operation assumes all the risk with maintaining people, processes, and supplying the workforce during the seasonal ups and downs. What a relief.

Technology

Warehousing operations are constantly upgrading warehouse management technologies. Leave this to the experts who understand and adjust to these changing technologies.

Business Intelligence

Business intelligence requires an ungodly amount of details and reports, which require a deep understanding of your supply chain and logistics. Lost you yet? But a warehousing operation – worth their salt – can track inventory management, supply, fulfillment, and supply you with the insight so you are better equipped with the small details and the big picture.

And Finally ... Reduced Overhead

Outsourcing your warehouse operations saves you some serious money. By sharing third-party facilities and an outsourced workforce, you can not only see instant savings to your bottom line, but also move warehousing operations from a fixed cost to a variable expense, depending on the current market.

If you have any questions, please don't hesitate to reach out to us. No obligations, honestly. We just want to help.

clientrecruiting@wilsonwarehouse.com

